

Journalism Beyond Leveson: Professional Culture versus Delinquent Subculture

This book considers whether journalism is, or could be, a profession as the concept is normally understood. Its focus is on the culture of journalism as expressed in the values, norms and ways of behaving of journalists, rather than the culture of the newsroom or press organisation. Leveson was concerned with the latter, but the concept of culture was treated only superficially by his Inquiry and the broader notion of the culture of journalism, as something distinct from corporate culture, was not examined at all. Journalism is not a profession in the normal sense of the word. It is increasingly university-based but there is no agreed core body of scientific knowledge underpinning it; the majority of journalists are not accredited; there is no clear set of values and norms underpinning behaviour; representative organisations and training organisations are disjointed and conflicted; and the primacy of their attachment to the freedom of the press (that is, the freedom of the organisations they work for) creates a barrier to the development of a responsible ethical practice. The book discusses the culture of a free press and evaluates journalism as a profession. It examines professional authority and regulation and investigates the history of journalism as an occupation in search of professional values. It has been argued that one of the historic features of the press has been the creation of moral panics in the general population but their irrational response to Leveson can be characterised as an immoral panic in defence of their corporate interests. The culture of journalism is not the same as the culture of the newsroom, but there is some way to go before it can be considered as a professional culture. The final chapter sets out how this might be brought about by journalists and university educators.
