

In Search of Authenticity: finding yourself after losing your faith

Church taught me to be arrogant and intolerant so sure of my beliefs that nothing could sway me away. These were considered admirable qualities because they protected me from other doctrines and religions. Admittedly, it made me a good follower but not much else. When I began researching and thinking for myself, that fear of the unknown made me wary and slowed my departure from the faith, but it didn't stop it. I floundered for years after losing my faith. Everything I held true and self-evident was gone. It was like dying and being born again completely alone. There was no family of faith to guide or direct my steps. I had to learn everything from scratch without spiritual parents to watch over me and keep me safe. Metaphorically speaking, I had to decide what to eat, where to place my knees, which direction to run or walk. Whatever I did, I had to do alone, without encouraging words or helping hands. It was hard, needlessly so, because I had to do it alone. Nobody should struggle through this alone, not when others have walked this path before. If you need encouraging words and helping hands, I'm offering them to you in this book. Your journey may have begun with a terrible loss, but I'm here to tell you that it doesn't end there.
