

Primitive Morals: Fifty Homilies (Desert Fathers Book 8)

You are holding the most recent and modern, English translation of Macarius' Fifty Homilies. This is an extensive effort to retrieve an exactness of his wording while comparing it to the other two English translations. Within these pages are extensive endnotes, totaling 1453 regarding Scriptures cited, of them some 274 are of MSS., and many previous translators' notations. Primitive Morals a.k.a. Fifty Spiritual Homilies of Pseudo-Macarius (Macarius the Syrian) is an authoritative patristic source. The Homilies are well described as spiritual Homilies. This is their purpose and their character. These are not dogmatic; they are not necessarily controversial, although certain portions are clearly so; nor are they expository; neither are they concerned with the politics or the expansion of the church; they have little to say about the Christians' duty to his fellow men. They have but one object, to help to bring individual souls to God in perfect self-subduing and absolute devotion. The heart in Macarius becomes the central theme within his spirituality, and is pervaded throughout his homilies. In the physical sense, we see the heart as the most vital organ, centrally crucial to the body's life force; in Macarius though, the heart becomes more complex, other than its physical importance, the heart acquires metaphysical and mystical connotations, which affects its significance toward the spiritual life, denoting the central aspect of one's personhood.
